

No science, please... real life problems, please...

Marion Schroedter-Homscheidt

DLR, German Remote Sensing Data Center, Germany

This I told my Diploma supervisor when I refused the PhD position offered to me at the end of my university studies. I'll talk about how I went to DLR in order to get contact to real life in industry related R&D and expected to leave after a few years.... and how and why I stayed there now for more than 15 years. At the end I became a scientist, made a PhD and work in rather practical and scientific projects on energy meteorology and the energy transition process in our society.
