During 2014-15, the UK Government commissioned an independent review of the socio-economic benefits of the Met Office. Known as the 'General Review', its aim was to provide a strong evidence base to underpin future decisions on the structure and function of the Met Office.

The General Review estimated that the Met Office will deliver a net value of nearly £0 billion (approximately 38 billion Euros) to the UK over the next 10 years.

This presentation examines the methodology and key findings of the Review, and discusses the ways by which the Met Office will realise and measure these benefits in the coming years.
